The mythical history of the British Empire in the East begins in a black hole. In the evolutionary history of stars, the black hole is a theoretical construct. Scientists tell us that most of the black hole's properties cannot be directly observed. When the core matter of a star cools, contracts, and collapses into a black hole, the space-time around it is so sharply curved that no light escapes, no matter is ejected, and all details of the imploding star are obliterated.

An Iraq and an Afghanistan can be invaded with impunity because they continue to reproduce their Black Holes. A great deal of Chatterjee's story makes for compelling reading. However, the claim that the book situates the 'history of the concept' of empire in the everyday lives of 'people' is not entirely convincing.
